AMUSEMENT NOTES.

The Great Comedy Hit, "Seven Days," Friday.

With the avalanche of laughter in "Seven Days," the comedy by Mary Roberts Rinehart and Avery Hopwood, that the Wagons and Kemper company will present at the opera house next Friday night, there is a pretty vein of "heart-interest" and romance.

The story of the play is really entertaining and ingenious, and with all its lightness and brightness there are touches of real sentiment. A young couple who are separated still love each other, and a girl who to save a situation, agrees to pose at dinner as the man's wife, is unexpectedly confronted by her affianced husband, who believes she has been married to another in his absence. Of course all ends happily after a week of the driest complications ever woven into a comedy, and in the entire three acts of whirlwind merriment there isn't a word to which the most squeamish could object. "Seven Days" is absolutely clean, for which thanks are due authors and producers.

Rennold Wolf, the brilliant writer for the New York Morning Telegraph, said of this comedy:

"Just sheer fun has been the object of the authors, and they attained it at the rise of the first curtain and never loosened their grip throughout three roaring acts. It is comedy that made the audience laugh until it cried. There is not a dull moment in the play. 'Seven Days' is the real gem of the season."

This riotously merry comedy holds the New York record, having run through the summer and into its second year, as well as for six months in Chicago. It will be acted here by an exceptionally brilliant New York cast and will be staged exactly as at the Astor theatre in New York.

Back to the Vermont Soil.

We print in another column a letter from an esteemed correspondent emphasizing what we have repeatedly said about the movement back to Vermont, and especially back to Vermont farms, which is one of the most gratifying signs of our times. Our correspondent shows in a concise way how well-known men from other states have helped to develop the single town of Charlotte during the past few years, to say nothing of the success won by many old-time residents, and it is safe to say that this chapter of success could be paralleled in a host of other towns scattered throughout the state.

This movement back to Vermont is but one of manifold evidences of the fact that the Green Mountain state is coming into its own. With some of the officials of the New York Central, Delaware & Hudson, the Pennsylvania and other great systems of transportation looking for places for summer outings in the Champlain valley, it is not necessary to prove that the outlook for this region as a tourist resort is flattering in the extreme. With the railroads vying with each other as to which shall do most for the development of the state as a tourist mecca and with other conditions combining to help push the Green Mountain state, there is every reason why we should be satisfied with the situation and do our part to help along the movement for a greater Vermont.—Burlington Free Press.

Where the Danger Lay.

"I understand you had a narrow escape at the seashore last summer."

"Yes, I rescued a woman from drowning."

"Come near marrying you, eh?"

"No, she was married."

"Then where does the narrow escape come in?"

"She had a son-in-law."—Houston Post.

Reciprocity with Canada.

There is if The News reads the signs aright, a gradual change coming over the people of Vermont at least, in relation to the proposed reciprocity treaty with Canada. At the first start-off there was a general whoop for the measure with all classes of people except the farmers.

Everyone is glad to welcome a movement tending to closer relations socially and in a business way with our neighbors at the north. But there now appears to be more inclination to stop to consider whether President Taft's measure is really reciprocity. Unless this country is getting as fair a deal as Canada, it is not the kind of reciprocity that will pass muster.

The farmers claim that they have not been properly considered; that there is discrimination against their products, while the manufacturer and the beef trust and other interests will continue to get protection.

In a way this contention is confirmed by out and out reciprocity advocates, when they contend that the success of the proposed treaty will mean reduced cost of living. If it does reduce the cost of living, it must be at the expense of the producer on this side of the Canadian line. If it does that, Vermonters certainly are not warranted in supporting it in its present form, because there is nothing in it to recompense the agricultural class of which this state is so largely composed.

The advocates of reciprocity are also in error on another point. Even a newspaper usually so well informed as the St. Johnsbury Republican says that the Vermont Republican platform declared emphatically in favor of reciprocity. Let us see just what it did say. Here is the declaration entire:—

"We favor such reciprocal tariff relations with the dominion of Canada as will the more actively stimulate the interchange of profitable trade between the two countries upon a basis fair to both and sufficiently protective of the interests of our own people."

Certainly no careful reader can construe that declaration as favoring trade relations with Canada which do not sufficiently protect the farmer of Vermont.

The News stands exactly in the position that it took at the start, when it said that:—

"The vital point is that Canada's exportation of products into the United States cannot be large enough to affect the American markets. The Canadian laborer is well paid and the exporters will be as anxious as anyone to keep up the prices for their products."

This means of course that The News does not believe that reciprocity will materially affect the price of our products and therefore, as a matter of course, will not reduce the living expenses of the consumer.

The News recognizes, however, that the agricultural interests view the matter from a different standpoint and while there is so well-defined opposition from this source it believes that it should be heeded until it can be shown beyond a question of doubt that it is wrong.

Whatever injures the farming industry of Vermont is bound to be a detriment to every other interest and a greater or less disaster to the state. There cannot be enough compensation in other directions to overcome any injury—providing there will be an injury to Vermont's agricultural interest.

Therefore let us go slow on this proposed deal with our Canadian neighbors.—Northfield News.

The Passing of Jennie.

"Jennie is dead," said a tired-looking woman in a wrapper, as she sat humped up on the top step of a neighbor's porch last evening. "John, her husband, wrote me all about it, and the letter came to-day. She knew toward the last she was going. The children were all asleep, and she went at midnight, but she would not let them be wakened; she asked John to lift her up so she could see them, and then sank away. Jennie was my youngest sister," continued she mournfully, "and I have been looking for the letter saying she was dead. She had quick consumption. She lived down in Arkansas and lived such a hard life; lots of children, poor, and nothing but work, work, work, from morning until night. I went down there about a month ago and took a lot of clothes for Jennie. We never said anything about it when she would wear them, but on one day I said: 'Jennie, I've got a set of clothes for you; where shall I put them?' and she asked to see them. I showed them to her and she seemed so pleased, and said: 'I haven't got any place to put anything so nice; put them in a clean four sack and hang them on the wall, and then tell John where they are.' That was all we ever said, but John said in his letter to-day: 'Jennie wore the clothes
